CALL FOR PROPOSALS

Treating the Self: Revisiting the Personhood of the Leader

Proposals Due by May 31st

In our quests as leaders to serve the needs of our group members, we sometimes fall prey to the illusion that the leader's personal identities and experiences are somehow outside of the group process, when, in reality, we bring into the group much of who we are as human beings. During a time of national and international crisis, in which the world is forced to re-examine past and current social injustices, many of us are challenged to confront ourselves in new ways. Whether we are enduring collective traumas or navigating life transitions, the experiences of the leader and the group members interact to create a group culture of either generativity or stagnation.

How do our visible and invisible identities (i.e. race, gender, sexual orientation, ability, immigration, religion, etc.), community memberships, allegiances, and lived experiences shape how we lead and participate in groups? How are we modeling self-awareness, self-care, advocacy, and curiosity for our group members? And how might our personal limitations, unexamined biases, or forestalled growth stifle the group?

We invite proposals that focus on the self as a group leader. How do our groups respond to our expressed or inferred individual and group characteristics? What role do we have in examining ourselves, and how does our self-reflection impact our group's capacity for exploration, confrontation, healing, and change?

We welcome submissions by mental health and group practitioners from all backgrounds and group approaches. We encourage people from underrepresented groups in the field (e.g. racial/ethnic minorities, LGBTQ+, economically disadvantaged) to submit proposals.
